Within the project i am unit coordinator for the University of Sannio of Work Package 20: Rationale for an International Maritime Carbon Tax.

Objectives Effectiveness: The maritime carbon tax is seen as the most effective tool to promote necessary behavioral changes for reducing emissions in international maritime operations, considering current technology.

- Economic Impact: It addresses the external costs of carbon emissions by internalizing them, potentially using revenues for industry-related clean technology research and deployment. However, the scope for industry retention of funds is limited, suggesting a focus on setting tax rates that are more about incentivizing emissions reductions rather than meeting spending needs.

- Revenue Utilization: The text discusses the delicate balance of setting a tax rate that doesn't aim to generate excessive revenue, which could stifle economic activity by increasing shipping costs disproportionately.

B. Comparison with Other Instruments

- Emissions Trading Systems (ETS): An ETS, which caps total emissions and allows trading of emissions allowances, offers similar incentives for emissions reduction as a carbon tax. However, it may suffer from price volatility and inefficiencies due to overlapping with other regulatory measures.

Description of work Alignment with Climate Goals: Restoration efforts will focus on enhancing carbon sequestration and improving resilience against climate-induced disasters. Success will be evaluated through carbon stock measurements, reductions in disaster-related damages, and improved ecosystem resilience, using climate modeling and ecological metrics. Stakeholder Engagement Across Sectors: The plan seeks to integrate restoration targets into national agricultural, urban planning, and fisheries policies, ensuring compliance through legal frameworks and policy enforcement. Progress will be measured by policy implementation rates, compliance levels, and stakeholder engagement metrics. Public Awareness Campaign: The project aims to establish an EU-wide campaign to raise awareness about biodiversity and ecosystem services, with measurable increases in public engagement and support. Effectiveness will be tracked through media reach, engagement figures, and shifts in public behavior towards sustainable practices. Objectives : Restoration efforts currently rely on non-binding recommendations and decentralized approaches, lacking uniformity and enforceability, often leading to suboptimal outcomes.
